Kanty resisted the attack by hitting Linen on the forehead with a beer glass, knocking him down and making an ugly and serious wound The wounded men clinched and a terrible fight ensued. It terminated by Linen receiving a frightful gash in the wrist from a knife or other sharp instrument. Officer Knight seeing the crowd running toward the saloon went over and found Linen lying senseless, from loss of blood in the doorway. Kanty had fled. The wounded man was placed under arrest. After a long search Kanty was found over on Ninth street. They were taken to the police station where a complaint was lodged against them for disturbance of the peace by fighting. The wounds of the two combatants were dressed there and sewed up. Bail was furnished and the two men were released.
